Wyoming Board of Land Commissioners Restrict Antler Hunting on State Lands West of the Continental Divide from January 1 – April 30

December 2012

At their October 4, 2012 meeting, the Wyoming Board of Land Commissioners approved a restriction prohibiting antler hunting on all parcels of land under the jurisdiction of the Board of Land Commissioners West of the Continental Divide, excluding the Great Divide Basin, from January 1 through April 30 of each calendar year. This restriction will begin on January 1, 2013. These lands are often referred to as “state lands” and are usually blue in color on land status maps. This state land restriction coincides with the current authority of Wyoming Statute §23-1-302(a)(xxxi) that gives the Wyoming Game and Fish Commission (WGFC) the authority to regulate antler collection on “public lands” west of the Continental Divide between January 1 and May 1, as per WGFC regulation, Chapter 61 Collection of Shed Antlers and Horns.

Many western Wyoming big game herds migrate from high elevation summer ranges to constricted winter ranges as a means to survive harsh winter conditions. Big game animals that concentrate on winter ranges are frequently faced with near starvation conditions, and human disturbances contribute to additional losses of fat reserves, which directly affects their survival. Disturbances can include wildlife viewing, development activity such as construction or energy exploration/production, off-road travel by snowmobiles and ATVs, and antler hunting. Winter range human activity restrictions have been in place for many years on some United States Forest Service (USFS) and Bureau of Land Management (BLM) lands on key winter ranges in western Wyoming and for decades on various WGFC lands and elk feedgrounds. Over the last decade, interest in antler hunting has increased dramatically. As antler hunting increases, additional harassment and disturbance of big game animals similarly increases. These disturbances are occurring at a time when winter conditions play a significant role in big game survival, and any harassment or displacement from crucial winter ranges can dramatically impact over-winter survival.

The WGFC antler hunting regulation prohibits antler collection between January 1 and April 30 throughout western Wyoming on public lands. State lands were not included in the regulation’s definition of public land as they are not considered public land in the same sense that BLM or USFS lands are. Therefore, antler hunting was legal on state land. As the public became aware of this, antler hunting activity significantly increased on state lands, resulting in enforcement concerns and harassment and displacement of big game animals from their crucial winter ranges.

The actions of the Wyoming Board of Land Commissioners to close state lands to antler hunting will allow game wardens to more effectively enforce the antler hunting regulation and clarify which lands are open or closed to antler hunting. More importantly, the intent of the antler hunting statute and regulation will be realized by reducing impacts and enabling big game animals to remain on more suitable winter habitats, thereby increasing winter survivability.
